Writing on the Berlin Wall: Remembering

Your Environmental Road Trip (YERT), Mark Dixon

(2010; 102 min.)

Three friends began their year long nation-wide road trip in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania to document environmental sustainability. They hoped to find sustainable regenerative solutions to further the current environmental movement beyond finding less harmful methods to solving ecological threats.

They traveled across the states to discover what Americans already do to benefit the environment, and learned what they should do differently to prevent a crisis. Along the way they placed restrictions on their waste, energy, and resource usage. They avoided using incandescent light bulbs, limited their daily water usage per person, and stored all of their trash inside a shoebox at the end of each month. This documentary ambitiously combats the present challenges that face the world by creating a unique set of restrictions on daily life in order to adopt a new, optimistic approach to maintaining the health of our environment.

9500 Liberty, Annabel Park & Eric Byler
(2009; 81 min.)

Prince William County, Virginia became an immigration battlefield in 2007 when elected officials adopted a law that forced police officers to question anyone who was "probably" undocumented.

Residents disrupted by the racial division united in protest by creating YouTube videos to confront the county seat. 9500 Liberty provides a voice for the residents and local businesses who have been forced to adopt this government policy and are fighting to reverse it.

Pricele$$, Steve Cowan
(2010; 58 min.)

Current electoral campaigns have grown so expensive that politicians are forced to rely on support from the wealth of the companies that they are intended to regulate once they hold office. The special interests of oil & gas companies, Wall Street and health insurers are now directly tied to the candidates they fund.

This documentary searches the U.S. for a solution to the conflicted interests within our electoral system and proposes an alternative system which has been tested in Arizona and Maine.
